This appeal concerns a magistrate court’s ability to enter an order retroactively modifying child support. Appellant Jacob Wilde argues the magistrate court should not have retroactively increased the award of child support he owed to Respondent Mickayla Taggart because Taggart did not present any evidence that the child support Wilde had been paying was insufficient. The district court affirmed the magistrate court’s decision that the modified child support be retroactive to the date of Wilde’s petition to modify the decree of divorce after concluding it was supported by substantial and competent evidence. Wilde now appeals to this Court.
