Supreme Court Seeks Information on Case Management Systems

The Idaho Supreme Court today announced it is seeking information on options for electronic case management systems for courts.

The Court's formal Request for Information (RFI) is available to read at isc.idaho.gov/procurement.

The case management system is the electronic repository of all case information and filings in Idaho's state courts. Idaho's Judicial Branch began using its current case management system nearly 10 years ago, adopting it as part of a transition from paper court records to a digital system.

Today's RFI will help the Court understand how the market has changed in those 10 years. There are no plans right now to replace Idaho's case management system, but this process will allow the Court to study what options have developed should it wish to consider a change.

The potential of that market is currently unclear. "No options or alternative systems of case management have been formally researched in at least 10 years," the RFI states. "... What other solutions exist, and where have they been successfully implemented?"

The RFI seeks details of other case management systems besides the one Idaho currently relies on – how those systems handle new case filings, assign and track cases, and many other questions.

This research will help the Court ensure it is making the best and most efficient use of public funds in its role overseeing Idaho's statewide court system.

Entities interested in responding to the RFI can find more information at the link above.
